Veranda Beach

By Margaret Pudlinski

I first heard about Veranda Beach on my grandparents' porch the summer I was 13. It was a lazy New England night that left the hills a smoky blue and the air heavy with the smell of rain. The last shadows were melting into dusk as conversation turned to the summer ahead.

"Any plans?" my grandfather asked. My father tipped his chair back and blew smoke rings into the air from his pipe. "Just Veranda Beach," he answered with delight. They all chuckled. My heart pounded. Veranda Beach? Where was it? When would we go?

"Why you're already there," my father teased. There was a gentle chorus of laughter as they told me the awful truth. Veranda Beach was the front porch. We were going nowhere. My adolescent spirits plunged. What did they see in the boring porch? Didn't they know that they grass was surely greener in some distant place?

Well, summer passed, and with age came wisdom. I realized the front porch was no enemy to adventure. It was a window on the world and a lesson in how the world works. What's more, the love affair continues this day - with new lessons adding to the old.

On my family's porch, I learned about life and love, hopes and dreams, and I learned about promises and trust. One day it was the front door to Tara, as my sister and I assumed awful southern accents and scouted the horizon for Rhett Butler. The next day it was a castle fortress or a ship at sea. And when Fleabags the cat brought home a rabbit, the porch was where I cried over the fragility of life.

On the veranda, my mother and grandmother would serve three o'clock tea - the icy glasses of flame colored liquid glowing richly in the summer sun. The tinkling of ice against the glass was the music of dogday afternoons. It was there that we children absorbed the etiquette of the porch - universal Rules for Porch Behavior that were never mentioned, but simply understood.

The screen door might slam shut, but the noise stopped there. We had no hair pulling, running or (heaven forbid) spitting. When we had to take on a sibling's temper, we descended to the lawn, where we could then tear each other limb from limb, but never on the porch.

For the adults, lighthearted bantering and games of checkers were encouraged, talk about taxes and checkbooks was not. The veranda was a place to enjoy little things. Life was slower there, and you could freeze-frame events.

Later at night, the porch took on a more serious side. In the house my sister, brother and I would lie in bed and listen to the muted conversations of generations. Sometimes they would talk about injustice, or we would learn from the quiet outrage in their voices. Over the years, fledglings paused to roost on our porch, turning into hawks, while I learned to set my own sights on shooting stars instead of fallen ones. Now, more than a few verandas later, I have become a connoisseur of the porch, the steps, and the stoop.

This summer I am spending time perched on a porch rail, trading stories with my children. We are watching fireflies and eating lots of ice cream from the truck that passes by.

As I watch a new generation write their names in the sweat of a lemonade pitcher, I hope that they, too, are learning lessons of Veranda's Beach.

Mrs. Forster, we wish you many happy memories at Veranda's Beach. ~ Thank you
